The wearer of the Australian Scout Medallion has achieved the highest award in the Scout Section, a section of Scouting for young adolescents.

To be awarded the Australian Scout Medallion, a Scout must achieve a number of goals throughout their time as a Scout. These goals aim to develop the Scout's full social, physical, intellectual, emotional, spiritual, and character potentials as a young person in an Australian and global society.

They will have shown significant personal development while demonstrating an active leadership role amongst their peers.

The award program develops young people through a system of progressive self-education that is guided by adults, but with an increasing level of responsibility placed on the Scout. It emphasises a set of community values, has a wide range of challenging activities, and utilises a team-based environment for leadership and teamwork development. Taking a Scout's adventures into the outdoors is fundamental to the educational outcomes of the Australian Scout Medallion.
